Footnotes and Provenance

Scholarly pages bury their citations at the bottom of the page. A text-layer extractor sees the same reading order as any other line: body first, rule, then the note block in note order.[1]

The anchor contract exists so a claim can cite the page without claiming the layout. Page-level provenance is honest; column and region provenance is a later tier.[2]

1. The rule is drawn as text here; a real rule is a path op.
2. Plans 05/06 own scan-grade and layout-aware extraction.

Second Page, Same Shape

The body continues. The footnote block anchors to the bottom of each page, so a page break between body and notes is a found artifact of the source, not of the extractor.[3]

3. The fixture pins the behavior, not the typography.
