Left Column: The Two Doors

Every page of this document was laid out in two columns. The reading order a human follows is column by column, but a recognition pass sees geometry first and semantics second, so the transcript may interleave what the layout separated.

The transcript is still faithful to the page: fidelity to the source order is a layout claim, and the header never makes one. The words are the words; their order is the engine's reading order.

Right Column: What Is Measured

The error rate for this class counts substitutions, deletions, and insertions against the column-ordered reference. A gap here is a real signal: either a word was misread, or the reading order moved, and the evidence records which class the gap belongs to.
