A Note Left on the Desk

This page was photographed rather than scanned. The camera tilted, the room light was warm, and the sensor added its own grain to the paper. Recognition still owes the same honesty here: the words it reads are recorded verbatim, and the confidence it reports is the confidence it actually holds.

The point of this fixture is the class of failure, not the failure itself. A clean scan flatters the engine; a photograph asks the question every desk in the world actually asks.